and cordially he traced the man’s career culminating in the Presidency of the University of Washington and, later, the Presidency of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. The address was rounded out with this tribute:

“He was stricken with that fatal illness on the steamship going from San Francisco to Seattle, the home of the university which he had made noteworthy, the home of the university into which he had poured the very best of his life and mind and strength. There come to my mind the lines of Robert Louis Stevenson’s ‘Requiem’ as applying with all their fulness to Henry Suzzallo’s end. As I recall them, they are these:

Here he lies, where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from the sea,
And the hunter home from the hill.”

Those who appreciate that memorial gathering in New York will also appreciate the fact that the great Library of the University of Washington, built during President Suzzallo’s administration, is now named The Henry Suzzallo Library.

EDMOND S. MEANY

For library use this new edition of McKenney and Hall’s Indians is in several ways superior to the original folio edition. The size is more convenient, ample notes are supplied for the student, and a lengthy introduction supplies biographical and bibliographical material of great value. The paper and type are excellent and the illustrations are faithfully reproduced in color.

CHARLES W. SMITH

This book is number XII in “Columbia University Contributions to Anthropology,” edited by Franz Boas, Professor of Anthropology in Columbia University. Such auspices hail the book as a dependable and professional piece of work.

The book is divided into three parts: “The Cycle of Life,”