

tentious manner. Mrs. Redfield is an early graduate of the University of Washington. She is the author of a volume of Verses published in 1907 containing several poems of local interest. The present work is illustrated and well printed and bound. Copies can be obtained by writing to Mrs. Redfield at 1220 Boren Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

Early Voyages of the Pacific; a Few Notes on the Days of Iron Men and Wooden Ships. Compiled by Archie W. Shiels. (Bellingham, Washington: Privately printed, 1930. Pp. 61.)

Attention is here called to a privately issued book that has not been intended for sale or general distribution. The author, Mr. Archie W. Shiels, disclaims any attempt at writing history. He has, however, for his own pleasure and that of his personal friends revealed some of the "highlights" of the early voyages to the Pacific Northwest. The little volume will serve as an excellent appetizer to more pretentious works. It is attractively printed and well bound and will be highly prized by those who may succeed in securing copies.

A History of the Pacific Northwest. By GEORGE W. FULLER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1931. Pp. 398. $5.00.)

This is one of the most important books recently appearing in the field of Pacific Northwestern History. The author has been for twenty years Librarian of the Spokane Public Library. That capital of the "Inland Empire" is the center around which the book is written. Mr. Fuller is the author of a three-volume work called The Inland Empire, a subscription work which was out-of-print on the day of publication in 1928. That success prompted the work on a volume with an enlarged title.

There is much of new material in the book and it will prove useful. There is a distinct value in having the historical perspective approach adjustment by a book of this kind. However, it is only an approach. The achievements of the coast settlements and industries are scantily treated in comparison with the greater attention given to the communities of the "Inland Empire." It may be that a more appropriate title for this new book could have been chosen. The lack of balance under the present title may be quickly tested by reference to the index where a search will be in vain to find any reference to such coast centers as Portland, Tacoma, Olympia or Tumwater. Seattle has one brief reference to an Indian attack. On the other hand Spokane accounts for eleven references.

The industry of the author and the wise skill of the publisher have combined to make A History of the Pacific Northwest an attractive and worth while book that will surely receive a generous measure of attention.

Montana in the Making. By NEWTON CARL ABBOTT. (Billings: Gazette Printing Company, 1931. Pp. 520.)

The author is Professor of Social Sciences in the Eastern Montana Normal School at Billings. His beautifully printed and elaborately illustrated book is intended for school use. Chancellor Melvin A. Brannon, University of Montana, says in the introduction:

"Montana in the Making is a class room and laboratory story of pioneers who came to the great Northwest in response to the urge for adventure and for achievement due to the buoyant human spirit within them. This laboratory and field study of Montana history was carried on in various localities of the state and all kinds of popular bulletins and general publications were drawn upon for materials."

The text and arrangement of topics reveal this industry as well as a dependable scholarship. One of the most helpful features is a series of eight small maps or graphs showing the political development of the Northwest from which the map of Montana emerges. Other maps, well selected illustrations, topical questions and suggested readings combine in a way that should make the book a delight to both teacher and student.

Two Warriors. By EDWARD LINCOLN SMITH. (Seattle: Frank McCaffrey at his Dogwood Press, 1931. Pp. 47.)

The two essays "John Knox, Saint or Sinner" and "Oliver Cromwell, His Place in History," were prepared by Rev. Edward Lincoln Smith for the Monday Club. They were given exquisite embodiment in this little book by Mr. Caffrey.

The Ruins of Kiatuthlanna, Eastern Arizona. By FRANK H. H. ROBERTS, JR. (Washington: Bureau of American Ethnology, 1931. Pp. 195. $0.65.)

This is Bulletin 100 in the publications by the Bureau of American Ethnology. The text and the superb illustrations reveal a rich harvest during the investigations conducted from May to September,
