Early Voyages of the Pacific; a Few Notes on the Days of Iron Men and Wooden Ships. Compiled by Archie W. Shiels. (Bellingham, Washington: Privately printed, 1930. Pp. 61.)

Attention is here called to a privately issued book that has not been intended for sale or general distribution. The author, Mr. Archie W. Shiels, disclaims any attempt at writing history. He has, however, for his own pleasure and that of his personal friends revealed some of the "highlights" of the early voyages to the Pacific Northwest. The little volume will serve as an excellent appetizer to more pretentious works. It is attractively printed and well bound and will be highly prized by those who may succeed in securing copies.

A History of the Pacific Northwest. By GEORGE W. FULLER. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1931. Pp. 398. $5.00.)

This is one of the most important books recently appearing in the field of Pacific Northwestern History. The author has been for twenty years Librarian of the Spokane Public Library. That capital of the "Inland Empire" is the center around which the book is written. Mr. Fuller is the author of a three-volume work called The Inland Empire, a subscription work which was out-of-print on the day of publication in 1928. That success prompted the work on a volume with an enlarged title.

There is much of new material in the book and it will prove useful. There is a distinct value in having the historical perspective approach adjustment by a book of this kind. However, it is only an approach. The achievements of the coast settlements and industries are scantily treated in comparison with the greater attention given to the communities of the "Inland Empire." It may be that a more appropriate title for this new book could have been chosen. The lack of balance under the present title may be quickly tested by reference to the index where a search will be in vain to find any reference to such coast centers as Portland, Tacoma, Olympia or Tum-
