Death of Doctor Seavey

Senator R. W. Condon kindly forwarded a clipping from the Port Townsend Leader of October 27, 1932, containing an obituary of Dr. Llewellyn T. Seavey who had passed away on Sunday, October 23. He was born in San Francisco in 1856 and during that same year the family moved to Port Ludlow. The friendly Indians were much excited over the appearance there of the first white woman and her baby. They kidnaped the baby but gave it up before the day was ended. The boy was educated in local schools and in Oregon and California. He studied medicine under Dr. G. V. Calhoun. For several years he served on ships in the California-Central American trade. He returned to Port Townsend in 1882 to continue the practice of his profession for the rest of life. He was one of Port Townsend's most prominent citizens.

Ancient Anchor of Rocks

Mr. W. R. Giffin has been seeking dependable information about an anchor on the top of Turtle Back Mountain, Orcas Island, in San Juan County, made of stones of varying sizes laid on the ground in the form of an anchor. He has published articles in the Friday Harbor Journal relating the theories of old pioneers. They remember that the stones were covered with moss in the old days and from that fact conjecture that the work may have been that of Spanish explorers at the close of the eighteenth century.

Two Simon Frasers

In a park of the City of New Westminster, British Columbia, there is a large statue on the pedestal of which is engraved: "Erected in honor of Simon Fraser to commemorate his discovery of the Fraser River 1808. New Westminster, September 1908."

The statue overlooks the river which has figured so often in the history of the Pacific Northwest. It is a deserved tribute to the explorer of the North West Company of Montreal.

In the recent revival of interest in the details of Canadian history there has arisen a conviction that there were two men of that name in the same company. W. S. Wallace discusses the question in The Canadian Historical Review for June, 1932, pages 183-
